Follow Me

Jesus's invitation to his first disciples was specific and particular, rooted in the language, culture and vocation they knew best. What metaphor would make more sense to four fishermen than the metaphor of fishing for people? They would have understood the nuances of that metaphor; from years of hard won experience, they would have known what depths of patience, resilience, intuition, and artistry professional fishing required. These men knew the tools of the trade, the limitations of their bodies and the potential dangers those limitations posed, and the life-and-death importance of timing, humility, and discretion. Most of all, they knew the water. They knew how to respect it, how to listen to it and how to bring forth its best in due time. When Jesus called these tried-and-true fishermen to follow him, they understood the call not as a directive to leave their experience and intelligence behind, but to bring the best of their core selves forward, to become even more fully and freely themselves.

We are invited to follow Jesus in the unique particulars of the lives, families, communities, cultures, and vocations in which we find ourselves. God prizes our intellects, our memories, our backgrounds, our educations, our skills and he will multiply, shape, and bring to fruition everything we offer up to him from the daily stuff of our lives. "I will make you," he tells the fishermen. "I will take, cultivate, deepen, purify, protect and perfect the person God created you to be." Surrender to Jesus isn't only about renunciation. It's about resurrection. It's about abundant and authentic life. When Jesus promises to "make us," it's a commitment to nurture us, not a threat to sever us from all we love. It's a promise rooted in gentleness and respect, not violence and coercion. It's a promise that when we dare to let go, the things we relinquish might be returned to us anew, enlivened in ways we couldn't have imagined on our own. [1]

Most of the time, the call of Jesus does not require that we leave our jobs. Rather, it invites us to see our work in a whole new light and to do our work for a whole new purpose. Whether we leave our jobs or not, a disciple's identity is no longer "fisherman," "tax collector," or anything else except "follower of Jesus." Adapted: [1] Debie Thomas
