The holy ground is the ground beneath your feet

'According to Luke, great crowds stream into the desert to hear John's fire-and-brimstone preaching. What attracts them? The first clue lies in the question they ask John at the conclusion of his sermon. "What should we do?" This is a question we ask when we've come to the ends of ourselves, when our cherished defences are down, when our lives are splitting at the seams. It's what we ask when we're weary, bored, disillusioned or desperate. "What should we do?" What do the crowds think such a fringe character will say in answer to their question? The answer John gives them is so radical we stand in danger of missing it: "You should go home." Go home to your families, your neighbours, your vocations, your colleagues. Stop fleeing. Stop insisting that God is far away from the nitty-gritty of your particular life. Instead of waiting for a holy 'some day' that will never come, inhabit the stuff of your life as deeply and as generously as you can right now. Share now. Be merciful now. Do justice now. Inhabit your life, no matter how plain, how obscure, how unglamorous, how routine. Why? Because the holy ground that matters most is the ground beneath your feet.' [1]

'John did not tell any of them to go and be something different. Instead he called them to be who they are but in a different way. He did not tell the tax collectors to go find an honest living. He asked of them honest tax collecting. He did not tell the soldiers to stop being soldiers but to be soldiers who respected others and understood the danger of power. He called the crowds to remember that their life is bound up in their neighbour's life and there is no room for indifference, complacency, or miserly giving.' [2]

'John concludes his sermon in the wilderness with a harrowing description of the coming Messiah: "His winnowing fork is in his hand, to clear his threshing floor and to gather the wheat into his granary; but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire." How is this good news, this portrait of a Jesus who judges, sorts, burns, and gathers us? I believe we squirm at such language because we misconstrue the meaning of judgment. We tend to equate judgment with condemnation, but in fact, to judge something is to see it clearly - to know it as it truly is. In my dictionary, synonyms for judgment include discernment, acuity, sharpness, and perception. What if John is saying that the Messiah who is coming really sees us? That he knows us at our very core? Maybe the winnowing fork is an instrument of perceptive love, patiently wielded by the One who discerns in us rich harvests still hidden by chaff. Maybe it is in offering God every aspect of our lives, that we give Him permission to "clear" us — to separate all that's destructive from all that is good, beautiful, and priceless. This is good news.' [1]
